SPECIAL ISSUE ON “CRITICAL ISSUES IN AMERICAN SOCIETY”

As the United States stands on the threshold of its 250th year of independence, the “balance sheet” shows that the country has made tremendous progress in various frontier areas such as the end of slavery, the end of legally-sanctioned discrimination, suffrage for women, Blacks and other racial groups, phenomenal technological advances, and the resulting growth and expansion of the economy, and innovations in communication. However, like any human enterprise, no matter the successes achieved, there are always ongoing challenges—the development of human society is dynamic and continuous and remains “work in progress.” Against this background, it is imperative that all stakeholders in the American society, including academics and practitioners, continue the quest of producing knowledge that will aid in the formulation and implementation of public policies that would address these societal challenges. Accordingly, the Ralph Bunche Journal of Public Affairs invites submissions for its special issue on “Critical Issues in American Society.” Papers addressing the following topics listed below are highly welcome:
